JOB DONE, LET THE REFORMATION BEGIN

BY DEREK BENNETT

We all know how sods law works, you butter your toast and add a good dollop of marmalade, then drop it and for some reason it always falls marmalade and butter side down. Sods law struck for my wife and I after we booked a weeks holiday to Sorrento starting on the 20th June. I always book my holidays after the local elections are over as it is usually safe to go away then. As I thought the referendum would not be called until either September or some time in 2017, I felt safe to take a break and then sods law struck a short time after when David Cameron announced the date was to be while we were away - a classic case of sods law indeed.

However, a lot of momentous things have happened while we have had past holidays in Sorrento. Our first visit was in 1990 while the first Gulf war was taking place and the knives were being sharpened for the Conservative stabbing in the back of Margaret Thatcher. It was after she had gone and the grey man, John Major took over, I began to realise in 1991 just how damaging to our democracy EU membership was. Again, in 1995, when we were on our fifth visit to the Grand Vesuvio Hotel in Sorrento, John Major resigned to stand as Tory leader again after all the trouble his subservience to the EU had created in his party. The following year, 1996, after our last visit to the same hotel I joined the Referendum Party, was selected as a candidate and my political activity began. So in a way, it seemed fitting that after a twenty year gap, when we were once again in the Grand Vesuvio Hotel, Britain voted, at long last, to quit the EU - although I would have liked to have been at the count to watch history in the making.

Since that fateful result in the early hours of June 24th, all hell has broken out politically, David Cameron has resigned and Jeremy Corbyn is in serious trouble with his own party. There have been accusations that those of us of more mature years have ruined the futures of the youth of the country. Sadly, as the youth have been brainwashed with a constant diet of pro-EU propaganda from the moment they walked through the school gates as infants, and through the rest of their education with Monet professors in universities who are paid to promote EU propaganda, none of them realise that the older generation have the wisdom of years behind them - which is why we voted to leave.

Unlike the brainwashed youth, those who voted in the last referendum in 1975, when we were the youth of the country ourselves, know of the deceit of the pro-EU extremists. We, after all, were victims of lies when we were told we were only voting for a trade agreement and there would be no European laws imposed upon us, there would be no loss of sovereignty and the threat of a single currency had been eradicated. It is no wonder, after we were so seriously misled, we had no option but to correct the huge error many of us made in 1975 - we have saved the inexperienced and brainwashed youth from the same mistake we made in our youth - in years to come they will thank us for saving Britain.

Derek Bennett: on holiday on the day of the referendum

Nicola Sturgeon has been having a hissy fit and is now threatening to call another referendum for Scottish independence as she wants Scotland to remain enslaved to the EU, this is a betrayal of the Scottish people. If they break away from a free UK they will lose the Barnett formula which means the average Scottish person is better served democratically and financially than the people of England. During Tony Blair and Gordon Brown's leaderships there was a high ratio of Scottish Ministers in Parliament - they were running the UK while the Scots were moaning about being governed by the English!

We now wait for the Tory and Labour parties to sort out their leadership problems and for the negotiations for British exit to begin. The first part of our job is done, we now have to ensure those negotiating our EU exit do not, once again,

BRITAIN'S GREATEST DAY SINCE VE-DAY

BY COLIN BULLEN

We won! After all the lies, the sneers, the threats, the interference from Cameron's foreign mates, the childish warnings from Osborne, the years of being brushed aside, called racists, morons, xenophobes and stupid we have triumphed over the arrogant political establishment and the vacuous celebrities, pampered luvvies and self interested, overpaid denizens of boardrooms.

The fight is not yet over as the days ahead will require us to defeat the Scottish harridan, the metropolitan liberals, and the propagandists of the BBC. Many of those who voted to remain in the EU are behaving like spoilt children who, when they cannot get their own way, throw a tantrum and shout about it not being fair, although it is perhaps not surprising that anyone who supports the undemocratic rule of Brussels bureaucrats should have only contempt for the democratic decision of the British people.

This was a victory for those whom the politicians have patronised as hard working families but whose views they treated with disdain. When we look around the country we can see that all those such as manual workers of the North, the fishermen, and the people who work hard for a decent wage, not having obscenely large salaries paid to them for meaningless jobs in public relations or the media, have voted to take back our country. The parasites who infest the opulent mansions of North London joined forces with so many of the Scots who hate the English, and don't realise how much worse they would be under a German hegemony, in an attempt to keep us trapped beneath the rule of Juncker and the arrogant pseudo fascists of Brussels.

It has been claimed that the vast majority of the younger generation supported the Remain campaign but, having been at our local count, I know that there was actually no way anyone could know the ages of those who voted. These statements are based on the opinion polls who have once again proved that they are as about as reliable as Mystic Meg on a bad day and it is absurd to make claims about the percentage of young versus old etc based on their meanderings. At the count I was probably one of the oldest of the Leave supporters, some of them looking about twenty. It is about time the opinion polls were laughed out of town. Lord Cooper of Populus assured Cameron at 10 p.m. on Thursday that Remain would win by twenty points!

Why the hell shouldn't older people vote. If this is a democracy then it's one man, one vote, not one man or woman up to 25 (or whatever age you choose) and the rest can just do what they are told. The youngest have been subjected to years of pro EU propaganda via the schools and the BBC. They have not yet experienced the need to get a job, buy a house, obtain maternity services etc and with age will come wisdom. There are some now claiming that if the franchise had been extended to sixteen and seventeen year olds Remain would have won. What next, ask the babies in their prams?

We stand with the steelworkers of Sheffield, the railwaymen, the coal miners of the North, the fishermen and all the ordinary people who are the backbone of this country. This was a victory for ordinary people and the working class. The overpaid and selfish metropolitan elites, with their celebrity groupies and those abroad with whom they have always had more in common than with their fellow countrymen, have been defeated and they don't like it, or even believe it.

It is time the supporters of the failed Remain campaign grew up, accepted that the people have spoken and began to work for the success which awaits our country as we once again become an independent, sovereign nation, looking out to the wider world, not obsessed with the declining and doomed European Union.

The stout common-sense of the British people has defied all those who would have destroyed our freedoms and have once again made Britain a beacon of hope for the world. Today those of us who have fought for our democracy over so many years feel, as Churchill said of his American guests the night of Pearl Harbour, as if we have been delivered of a long pain, and we can, as did he, go to bed and sleep the sleep of the saved and thankful.

As the great man himself would say "Advance Britannia!".
