

Can so many economists be wrong?

The latest scaremongers to jump on Cameron's bankwagon have been a group of academic economists. According to an article in the Independent, more than 90 per cent of the academics questioned by the Centre for Macroeconomics at the London majority, arguing that there would actually be financial benefits from withdrawing from the EU.

In other words, it looks like déjà vu. Even clever people, if they latch on to dumb economic theories like contemporary Keynesianism, can get things very, very wrong.

Photo by Images_of_Money